. From a late London paper. THE BATTLE OF WATERLOO. BY W T. FITZGERALD.

"Arraign'd by nations let the culprit stand, At Europe's bar-and there uplift his hand! The shades of murder'd Enghein, Palm. and Wright,

And all the massacres that marked his reign-The bones that whiten Jaffa's dreary plain, those that bleach beneath the Northern sky, All on his head for retribution cry!

Mercy, too long abused, will cease to plead, When the world dooms the man of blood to bice! And should degraded France his cause maintain.

She shares his guilt-and ought to share his pain. So sang a bard, whose lays for years express'd

The honest hatred of a patriot breast. Against the vile oppressor of mankind. To whose black crimes some dazzled eyes were blind :

The Muse's prophecy complete at last. Thy reign detested Corsican! is past And Heaven decreed in its appointed hour.

That Britain's arm should crush the tyrant's power. But where's the Bard, however grac'd his name Can venture to describe great Welleslev's fame Such bard, in strength and loftiness of lays,

May som beyond hyperbole of proise,
And yet not give the tribute that is due To Briten's, Wellington led on by you! For to the plains of Waterioo belong The magic numbers of immortal song! A Homer's lyre, or Casar's pen should

How Brunswick died, and valiant Picton fell; How Ponsonby, too, shar'd their honcur'd fate. And join'd in death, the gallant and the great; How learer'l Wellington seiz'd fortune's hour.

To blast, like lightning, Buonaparte's power,
And with a mighty and tremendous

Confound, defeat, annihilate the fce : In vain the cuirassier's advance,

The tyrant's boast, the pride of France To break our hollow square, Ten times they charge, ten times retire, Again they face the British fire,

To perish in despair New masses on our squares descend, They also charge to meet their end, And countless warrior's fall; Horses and horsemen strew, the plain, And cannon, mingled with the slain, One fate attends them all!

So on some bold projecting rock. The forious oillows beat. But still it stands the mighty shock,

And spurns them from its feet! Thus long defensive Briton's stood, And brav'd the overwhelming flood,

With constancy divine! Till the brave Prussian's distant gun, Induced the glorious Wellington, To form the British line.

His eagle eye surveys from far, That moment which decides the war, ' Forward!' he cried, 'for England's glory !

The veteran bands of Gallia yield, And Waterloo's triumphant field, Shall shine in British story! Not Cressy, Agincourt, or Blenheim's

Could bear a noble wreath of fame away; And Princely Edward, Henry, Marlborough too, Had done that justice, Wellington to vou!

Such mighty triumphs must be purchased dear.
And on her laurels Vict'ry drops a tear!

The sweetest tribute to the fallen brave, Are soldiers' sorrows-on a soldier's grave!
The blood that's shed gives every bosom pain, With this soluce—it is not shed in vain For to their noble death their country owes Her high renown, and Europe her repose!

On lofty columns of eternal fame,

Shall British gratitude record each name:
There ever shall each Sister Isle behold,

Her gallant sons immortalized in gold; But deeper far, eternally imprest, Shall live their memory in the patriot breast!

Nor shall the gallant Germans be forget Who shar'd their triumphs and partook their lot.
